Whistleblowing Extended Toolkit

Through an ethical systems lens, whistle blowing empowers workers to speak up for principles and ethics and shines a light on unethical practices that can cause economic and reputational risks for organizations as well as negative consequences for consumers, citizens and colleagues.

Unlike common perception that whistle blowers are "traitors" or "rats", an ethical approach is to view internal whistle blowers as concerned employees who possess the qualities and motivations that leaders should cultivate to sustain the long term health of the organization and its stakeholders.
Organizational Priorities

In an ethical organization, internal whistle blowing serves as a powerful mechanism to protect and grow the economic, legal, and reputational value of a business.

To make this shift, organizations need to prioritize ethics and create a culture of integrity and speaking up.

Research has shown that the most important factors that influence reporting intentions and behavior include:

- Leadership
- Perceived support
- Organizational justice
- Organizational culture
- Type of organization
- Risk of retaliation

On paper, every organization thinks of itself as “ethical.” How can we reconcile this with today’s ultra-competitive corporate climate that prioritizes profits and continual growth? The result is that companies can, and occasionally do, take short cuts that endanger the organization, its customers as well as the public (see some recent examples).

But why do these shortcuts occur? If an issue is systemic, it may need a massive investment of time and capital to correct- and that may not be a luxury profit-driven companies can afford.

Companies and CEOs must shift their priorities and focus on:

1. The long-term vs. short-term (link coming soon)
2. Stakeholder value (link coming soon)
3. How and why ethics pays
Ideas to Apply

Consensus seems to be that organizational context strongly influences the whistle blowing process and experience. Congruent to systems thinking, these 4 nudges help make internal reporting work:

1. Make ethics part of the core organizational values
   - Establish a code of conduct and incorporate in recruitment materials, employee contracts and internal policies

2. Create structures and systems that visibly protect and incentivize internal reporting, i.e. particularly speaking truth to power (and sanction retaliation)
   - Institute robust and effective Compliance and Ethics programs

3. Leaders act as role-models and active listeners to promote cultures of speaking up
   - Hire and develop leaders who exhibit ethical behavior and influence ethical cultures

4. Apply a systems approach, including:
   - The individual dimension
     - What characteristics influence intentions and reporting behavior? (to come)
   - The organizational dimension
     - How can you encourage employees to speak up?
     - In what ways does leadership and organizational culture predict behavior?
   - The legal dimension
     - How do laws and rewards, like the SEC Whistleblower Program, influence the whistleblower’s behavior, the process, and organizations?
